China's Internet Mess

Search-engine firms routinely use spyware to capture market share. Now they face allegations of click fraud.

Zhou Rengen knows the value of online advertising. His Web site, yyzs.net, is one of the largest online shopping sites for __1__ (PHARMACY) products in China. Zhou needed to be at the top of everyone's search list. In 2004 he signed a contract through a __2__ (SELL) agent to register with Baidu, China's leading search engine and a rival to American giants Yahoo and Google. Baidu listed Zhou's site among search returns as a sponsored link, and in return Zhou paid a per-click fee to Baidu.

One day Zhou noticed that his payments to Baidu had risen precipitously. Using tracking software, he found that about 70 percent of __3__ (VISIT) to his site came from one Web site: an online encyclopedia, Baidu Knows, sponsored by Baidu. Since there were no links on Baidu Knows to Zhou's site, Zhou reasoned that the clicks were deceitful—generated by software to inflate __4__ (ADVERTISE) charges. In September, Zhou filed a lawsuit accusing Baidu of click fraud.

Click fraud is notoriously hard to prove, and Baidu denies everything. However the lawsuit underscores the dark side of the Internet in China, where search-engine companies, in an effort to grab a slice of the Internet advertising pie, resort to __5__ (TACT) that would not be tolerated in the West. In particular, Baidu and Yahoo, two of the biggest search firms in China, are accused in lawsuits of routinely using spyware—a type of software that installs itself surreptitiously on users' PCs—as a way to drive users to their sites. Although spyware is not __6__ (LEGAL) in China, its uncontrollable use has turned Web surfing into a supremely frustrating experience. And because spyware is associated with criminal activities like identity __7__ (THIEF) in addition to the merely annoying pop-up ads, it may be undermining consumer __8__ (CONFIDENT) in the Web. "Complaints are common in China," says Liu Bin, new-media __9__ (ANALYSE) at Beijing-based consultant BDA.

China's spy wars began in the late 1990s, when entrepreneur Zhou Hongyi invented a Chinese-language search bar, called 3721, that users could install on their __10__ (BROWSE). The bar was so successful that rivals quickly began appearing—and many of them used spyware that replaced 3721 with other search bars without users' knowing. Zhou responded in kind—by sending out spyware programs that reinstalled 3721. Now, he says, all the search companies use spyware: "Those who aren't using spyware are fools."

Spy probe focuses on two capitals

Adapted article from TheBBC, 5 December 2006

UK police investigating the death of Alexander Litvinenko are now pursuing inquiries in both London and Moscow.

A hotel and an office are the latest central London locations to be tested for signs of the radioactive substance found in the ex-KGB agent's body. A room at the British Embassy in Moscow is also being tested as a precaution. Home Secretary John Reid has said officers will "follow the evidence" as Russia warned speculation on the death was harming relations with the UK.

Potential witnesses

Officers from the Metropolitan Police's counter-terrorism command plan to interview several potential witnesses in Russia during their trip, which could last weeks. Mr Lugovoi (a former KGB bodyguard) visited the British Embassy building in Moscow last week to deny any involvement in his death.

Polonium-210

Litvinenko's death is being linked to radiation poisoning by the highly toxic isotope polonium-210, which was found in his body. The Parkes Hotel in Knightsbridge - where Mr Lugovoi reportedly said he had stayed - and an office in Cavendish Place were being examined in London on Monday.

Tests carried out by the Health Protection Agency (HPA) at the Best Western Hotel in Shaftesbury Avenue, London, found nothing of concern to public health.

Friends believe Mr Litvinenko was poisoned because of his criticisms of the Russian government. Russia's foreign minister, Sergey Lavrov, said Kremlin officials should not be involved in the British police inquiry and that the "tragedy" should not be politicised.

"If the British have questions, then they should be sent via the law enforcement agencies between which there are contacts," he said.

"We are talking about the need to avoid speculations on this subject."

COFFEE WITH JAMES

HTTP://WWW.BBC.CO.UK/CORNWALL/CONTENT/ARTICLES/2007/03/13/JAMESMORRISONFAN_FEATURE.SHTML

Cornish singer/songwriter James Morrison has made a dream come true for a young cancer sufferer. Natalie Edwards is undergoing treatment for Hodgkin's Lymphoma disease. The surprise visit was set up by Cornish charity Tanya's Courage Trust.

For 17-year-old Natalie Edwards meeting James Morrison is something she ____ (1) ____ (NEVER FORGET).

Natalie met the singer before his sell out concert at the Hall for Cornwall.

"He made me a cup of coffee, not many people can say they ____ (2) ____ (HAVE) coffee made by James Morrison," smiles Natalie. "He was really down to earth. I went to the sound check too. It was all amazing."

BBC Cornwall's Matt Shepherd went along ____ (3) ____ (MEET) Natalie and her Mum Jacqui to talk about the special evening. Natalie also went to watch the show, and had a song dedicated to her by James Morrison.

"He spoke to the audience and said he ____ (4) ____ (MEET) me today, and that he was going to dedicate 'Wonderful World' to me, and I burst into tears," says Natalie.

"The first verse of the song sums up how I feel. He ____ (5) ____ (THINK) it through, and picked the right song. I thank him very much for that."

The meeting ____ (6) ____ (ORGANIZE) by Tanya's Courage Trust, a St Austell based charity set up in memory of teenager Tanya Billing.

Tanya lost her brave battle against leukaemia at the age of 17. Her family now organise special days for other young cancer sufferers in Cornwall.

Natalie is currently undergoing chemotherapy for Hodgkin's Lymphoma at the Royal Cornwall Hospital.

"I'm lucky really as I have chemo every two weeks and some people have it every week," she says. "I am now on my fifth chemo, it ____ (7) ____ (GET) worse and worse as it goes. But I look on the bright side and I only have two left."

Natalie's mum Jacqui Edwards says meeting James Morrison has really lifted her daughter's spirits.

"I want to send a special thank you to James and his family, they ____ (8) ____ (NOT REALISE) what they have done for Natalie. She has gone from a little mouse to a lion. I'd like to send a warm thank you from the bottom of my heart to them all."

Throughout her treatment Natalie ____ (9) ____ (KEEP) a diary. She plans to launch a website in the near future, which she hopes ____ (10) ____ (HELP) other young cancer sufferers in Cornwall.
