Food for thought: how one young entrepreneur turned a drunken idea into a tasty business

Adapted from: <http://www.independent.co.uk/student/food-for-thought-how-one-young-entrepreneur-turned-a-drunken-idea-into-a-tasty-business-2146851.html>

While recent graduates everywhere are busy panicking about their lack of job opportunities, 24-year-old Josh Magidson is feeling pretty smug. After all, Londoner Josh has just sold the website he set up at university to the e-commerce giant Just Eat for £500,000. The website, eatstudent.co.uk, allows students to view local takeaway menus and order food to be delivered straight to their halls of residence.

And now, instead of working from his bedroom at home, Josh works in the swanky Just Eat headquarters in Farringdon, London, and Eatstudent has a presence at eight universities across the UK. He was unwilling to reveal his new salary, but he's obviously doing alright: "I'm doing much better than I expected to be doing at my age. That's all I'm willing to say. I don't want to go out to dinner with my friends and be expected to pay for everyone..."

It all started in 2006, at the end of Josh's first year at uni, after a messy night out in Nottingham, where he was studying English. "Some friends and I were desperate for a pizza, but we couldn't find menus or phone numbers anywhere." In the end they went hungry, but it got Josh thinking. "I just couldn't believe there was nowhere on the internet that had all this information."

Josh paid a friend £50 to set up a simple website and, with a small team of fellow students, persuaded all his local takeaways to sign up. "When we launched it, we didn't have to spend any money on marketing; we just relied on word of mouth." Like Mark Zuckerberg, the billionaire founder of Facebook, Josh benefited from the way news spreads within the student community. Indeed, he even admits that Zuckerberg was one of his inspirations. "When I came to university Facebook was just starting up. Obviously, I'm no Zuckerberg, but I was certainly influenced by his story."

Unlike the Facebook founder, Josh did not drop out of university. "The website was always a side project while we were studying, earning us about £200 per week," Josh says. "We would spend a few weeks at the beginning of each term setting it up and making sure it was all running OK."

When he graduated, however, it was a different matter. "The job market was so bad that I decided to take on the project full time." Josh recruited Edward Green, a friend from school who had just finished a History degree at Cambridge University. They both invested £4,000 each of private money to improve the website before they started approaching big companies for investment. "We had proof of concept and the business was growing. We just needed some serious money to take it to the next level."

In July this year the universities minister David Willetts caused mild controversy by suggesting that if graduates couldn't find a job they should start their own businesses. "We have some odd definitions of what constitutes a graduate job," said Willetts. "The most vivid example of that is that setting up your own business does not constitute a graduate job.” Josh agrees. “Most people go back and live at home when they leave university. They don’t have a mortgage and they don’t have a family. It’s the best time to start a business.” He is also well aware of the risks: “I obviously wouldn’t recommend that people plough a lot of money into it, but even if the venture isn’t a success after a year or two, you have great experience that could help you get a job.”

For Josh this is only the beginning. “We’re looking to grow the business 100 per cent every month,” he says. “The key is to spread to new universities.” Next up are Bristol, Sheffield, Warwick and Liverpool in January and within the next two years he wants Eatstudent to be in every university in the country. It doesn’t stop there. “My ambition is to take it not just national but international. There are some great university cultures outside the UK.” So, watch out. Eatstudent could be coming to a university near you, and just as Zuckerberg noted the student population’s capacity for endless socialising, Josh Magidson knows not to underestimate student demand for fast food.

Men and Women Spend About the Same Time on Chores Says a New Study: Is That True at Your House?

Adapted from: <http://www.ivillage.com/men-women-have-equal-chore-time-true-your-house/6-a-367050>

According to the recent cover story in Time magazine, data from the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics suggests that women and men (who are married, employed and have kids) are now pretty much on par with each other when it comes to the amount of time they work each week. The piece on "Chore Wars" claims that women 1 work outside the home only 2 about 20 minutes more per day of work (both paid and unpaid) 3 their husbands. But that doesn't mean men and women are necessarily doing equal amounts of the same things: Women are still doing more of the childcare and housework—and although men aren't necessarily putting in the hours at home, they are logging more time 4 the office.

Do the results reflect a 5 change in 2011? Back in 1990, Arlie Russel Hothschild's book The Second Shift declared there was a 15-hour discrepancy between the amount of work women and men did in a week. Hothschild's research implied that moms 6 home from working full-time 7 and began their "second shift" of tasks like cooking dinner and 8 of the kids, while their husbands kicked back. In fact, Hothschild found that women and men only shared equal household responsibility in 20 percent of marriages -- and that many women accepted the inequity to keep the peace.

But 20 years later, it looks 9 moms and dads are sharing 10 responsibility when it comes to things like cleaning and childcare, which makes for happier marriages—if only because there is 11 resentment and frustration when both partners pitch in. But I also think that women today are less likely 12 their partners get away with not helping out.

In our house, I still do most of the housework, but I am a mom who stays at home and I consider that part of my job. Nevertheless, I fall into the same "equal time" category as working moms: As soon as my husband steps foot inside our house, the responsibilities fall to both of us—even if I am a little bit resentful that he got a whole 15 minutes of commuting time without two small people fighting over a Lego. If I'm cooking dinner, he's playing with the kids. If he 13 the kids a bath, I'm folding laundry. If I'm reading them books before bedtime, he's loading the dishwasher and cleaning up the kitchen.

And when everyone's tucked in and it's finally just the two of us, that's when we can relax together. There's very little resentment between us (though I admit it took us a while to get there -- at first it seemed like my husband thought he 14 two hours of downtime after working all day, 15 wasn't fair to me or the kids) and we've settled into a happy and healthy routine. Are things equally split in your house?

Today I Had a Rotten Day

by Kenn Nesbitt

Adapted from: <http://www.poetry4kids.com/poem-265.html>

Today I had a rotten day.
As I was coming in from play
I accidentally stubbed my toes and tripped and fell and whacked my nose.
I chipped a tooth. I cut my lip.
I scraped my knee. I hurt my hip.
I pulled my shoulder, tweaked my ear,
and got a bruise upon my rear.
I banged my elbow, barked my shin.
A welt is forming on my chin.
My pencil poked me in the thigh.
I got an eyelash in my eye.
I sprained my back. I wrenched my neck.
I'm feeling like a total wreck.
So that's the last time I refuse when teacher says to tie my shoes.
